Automatic withdrawal, mass payment and ...»(Reuters Health) - Common forms of violence - such as domestic violence, sexual assault and stalking - are as common as alcohol and marijuana use, and are experienced by up to one in three U.S. adults at some point in their lives, a U.S. study suggests. Past research has linked all forms of violence - including intimate partner violence and child abuse - to an increased risk of alcohol use, high blood pressure, anxiety, depression and drug and alcohol use, the authors write in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine. But they note that more work is needed to determine if violence can actually increase alcohol use and lead to more problems. "Our findings suggest that it is appropriate to view violence as a 'public health' problem that warrants public health intervention," said lead study author Kathryn Peterson of the National Institute of Mental Health in Bethesda, Maryland. "However, there is a need for additional research to establish the causal direction of the relationship between violence and alcohol use,” she said by email. “For example, we do not know if violent events lead to alcohol use and related harms or if alcohol use contributes to violence,” she added. The authors identified 29 studies published between 1966 and 2014 that included 12,257 participants. They say they combined data from 11 of these studies to create a composite estimate of the prevalence of lifetime and past-year violence in a U.S. general population. They found that, overall, about 24% of U.S. adults said they had experienced some form of violence during their lifetimes and about 23% said they had experienced violence during the past year. Women were almost twice as likely to have experienced violence in their lifetimes as men, and men were more likely to have experienced violence during the past year. When they examined the rates of violence among individuals with substance use disorders - such as alcohol and marijuana use disorders - they found rates of lifetime and past-year violence were even higher. For example, about one-quarter of individuals with an alcohol use disorder reported lifetime violence, compared with 22% of those without an alcohol use disorder, the authors report. Among those with marijuana use disorder, 17% reported
